Munch's journals are a window into the mind of a tormented and brilliant artist. They are filled with passages that reflect his intense emotions, his despair, and his moments of profound insight. He writes about the anguish he felt over his father's death, his struggles with anxiety and depression, and his desperate search for love and acceptance.

Through his writings, we come to understand the deep-seated fears that haunted Munch throughout his life. He was terrified of illness and death, and he often felt overwhelmed by a sense of existential dread. Yet, alongside his fears, there was also a burning desire to create and express himself through art.

Art as a refuge and a torment

For Munch, art was both a refuge and a torment. He found solace in painting, but he also struggled with the weight of his own genius. He writes about the pain of seeing his work misunderstood and criticized, and the frustration of feeling that he was never able to fully convey the depth of his emotions on canvas.
