What the Report Found

The Mueller Report found that the Russian government interfered in the 2016 presidential election in a "sweeping and systematic fashion." The report found that the Russian government used a variety of methods to interfere in the election, including:

- Hacking into the computer systems of the Democratic National Committee and the Clinton campaign
- Releasing stolen emails and other documents
- Using social media to spread disinformation and propaganda
- Contacting Trump campaign officials to offer assistance

The report also found that the Trump campaign had numerous contacts with Russian individuals during the election. The report did not find that the Trump campaign conspired or coordinated with the Russian government to interfere in the election. However, the report did find that the Trump campaign was "receptive" to Russian assistance.

The Legal Implications of the Report

The Mueller Report did not make any recommendations on whether or not to prosecute Trump for obstruction of justice. However, the report did provide evidence that Trump may have obstructed justice. The report also discussed the legal issues that would be involved in prosecuting Trump for obstruction of justice.

The House of Representatives voted to impeach Trump for obstruction of justice in December 2019. The Senate acquitted Trump on both charges in February 2020.
